thinking and learning expert, author, consultant and resource developer

Dates: Mon. 25th thru Tues. 26th February, 2013

Venue: The Greek Club, South Brisbane

Times: 9am to 4pm (8.30am registration on day one)

From the time that our kids enter primary school, they are immersed in a diversity of text types – they read and write them, across a range of contexts. When learners are faced with their first NAPLAN assessment experience, they have a history that includes more than 12 terms of learning in the areas of text structure, punctuation and language features. If their NAPLAN results are less than desired, this is likely a symptom of a more fundamental problem. This 'thinking-based literacy' workshop addresses that fundamental problem.

- Discover the THREE ways that teachers unintentionally inhibit student learning.
- Explore how working memory and long term memory must work together to enable learners to lock in their learning, and ultimately transfer it to new situations.
- Explore a suite of tools and strategies that promote the deliberate processing of new learning; and encourage the development of deep knowledge, and deep, enduring understanding.

- Investigate a process that guides learners in the explicit deconstruction of persuasive texts so that they are able to construct their own QUALITY texts.
- Explore a sequence of thinking tools that strategically and developmentally guide students to deeply learn the punctuation and language features associated with persuasive texts.

NOTE: the tools and strategies introduced in this workshop are transferable to all text types; and to all learning levels
